It is the most complete solution for communication connections on the electrical network in order to be able to transmit data. In particular, the G.hn system is a solution for the deployment of Ethernet for electrical power distribution networks, as a multi-service, wideband and high-efficiency solution. In order to design the G.hn range, the international standardization (ITU-T) working group has thoroughly analyzed the basic characteristics of the power distribution network with a view to the functioning and provision of their components. Characteristics of the Power Distribution Network Individual customers, also known as the electricity users, often have different requirements for electricity, but all have a common goal: to supply the required electricity with the lowest cost. One of the objectives of the distribution network is to unify the electricity that is distributed within a more flexible and efficient manner in the entire system. It is therefore necessary to take into account not only the requirements of the electrical networks, but also the weather forecasts, the forecasts of the industrial and commercial activity and thus the requirements of electrical utilities. A complete distribution network must be considered, in which all of the above-mentioned conditions are taken into account for optimal operation. Therefore, it is necessary to develop a network protocol that meets all of the requirements associated with electricity. This is the reason why the ITU-T working group has selected the power distribution network in order to design the G.hn range. From 2016, the ITU-T working group has developed the G.hn technology as a comprehensive set of mandatory standards, which also covers the devices required to implement the G.hn technology. All of the G.hn components have a modular design and a basic functionality. Enhancements and new features of G.hn and its basic functionality The main purpose of the ITU-T working group's G.hn development is to guarantee: great power
